In Sunny Italy.

QUISIANA, CAPRI, August 4, 1901.
(After sunset on a balcony.)

Dear Friends—I will commence a letter now which should have been begun before. It is hard to leave off looking at our beautiful surroundings. The breeze is cool. We dine at eight which time will soon arrive. I have just returned from a trip to a height about 1000 feet above sea level where there are extensive ruins of the House of Tiberias. Five of us rode donkeys. One of our number had never been on a boat before and clung to the donkey all the way up and entirely refused to ride down. There were two women and three girls who led, beat and generally encouraged the donkey. As we returned the sun set. The smoke from Vesuvius rendered it easy to look at. The view from that height of the sea, islands, volcano and mountains generally is most charming. Numerous sail boats added charm but I did not look at them as I have done before yesterday's experience. This morning at four o'clock I looked out from our balcony and the view in the moonlight was bewitching. This hotel is indeed grand. Everything is white and clean. The wall decorations are of delicate colors and in good taste. The garden is a marvel of tropical beauty. There are oleanders beautiful beyond the usual, lemon trees with large ripe fruit, oranges, palms, great geraniums and heliotropes.

The Pompeii hotel was afflicted with such a plague of flies that no one could eat with any degree of comfort, and the place was generally dirty, but we could easily get along with that for the wonderful experience of the day. I was greatly moved at the sight of Vesuvius itself sending forth in the morning a great column of vapor and smoke to a great height. At noon the column was very dark, and in the afternoon as we rode away from it, as I watched it, the smoke settled sulkily about its summit. I thought of the great eruptions which have caused so much destruction and wondered when the sleeping giant would again rouse himself. Pompeii itself, only two thirds excavated as yet, is of course of great interest even in the few hours we gave it. The rooms or shops are most of them small. One house of considerable pretensions has recently been uncovered and the garden, statues etc., cleaned and set up as they were when the destruction came more than 1800 years ago. The wall decorations are very bright and the drawing is excellent. There are small pictures of cocks fighting, birds eating cherries, deer and dogs, fruits etc. On the garden walls are large pictures of wild animals. In the museum are casts of people in the form and position in which death found them. There were charred cakes, clothing, casts of a wheel etc. We shall see much more of the same sort in Naples. The narrow streets of the dead city are paved with large irregular stones with a curb stone about a foot high. At intervals in these streets are great stepping stones with spaces between for the passage of wheels. The ruins in the solid stone show how great had been the travel. As the books tell, there are buildings which were ruins and some which were not completed when the end came. There are baths and the inevitable forum. There are great fields of hemp in which we saw many people working, stripping, pulling, laying out to dry, gathering in bundles in October next, and on or before the third day thereof, (if the term shall so long continue; and if not then before the end of the Pompeii hotel was afflicted with such a plague of flies that no one could eat with any degree of comfort, and the place was generally dirty, but we could easily get along with that for the wonderful experience of the day. I was greatly moved at the sight of Vesuvius itself sending forth in the morning a great column of vapor and smoke to a great height. At noon the column was very dark, and in the afternoon as we rode away from it, as I watched it, the smoke settled sulkily about its summit. I thought of the great eruptions which have caused so much destruction and wondered when the sleeping giant would again rouse himself. Pompeii itself, only two thirds excavated as yet, is of course of great interest even in the few hours we gave it. The rooms or shops are most of them small. One house of considerable pretensions has recently been uncovered and the garden, statues etc., cleaned and set up as they were when the destruction came more than 1800 years ago. The wall decorations are very bright and the drawing is excellent. There are small pictures of cocks fighting, birds eating cherries, deer and dogs, fruits etc. On the garden walls are large pictures of wild animals. In the museum are casts of people in the form and position in which death found them. There were charred cakes, clothing, casts of a wheel etc. We shall see much more of the same sort in Naples. The narrow streets of the dead city are paved with large irregular stones with a curb stone about a foot high. At intervals in these streets are great stepping stones with spaces between for the passage of wheels. The ruins in the solid stone show how great had been the travel. As the books tell, there are buildings which were ruins and some which were not completed when the end came. There are baths and the inevitable forum. There are great fields of hemp in which we saw many people working, stripping, pulling, laying out to dry, gathering in bundles in October next, and on or before the third day thereof, (if the term shall so long continue; and if not then before the end of
